Children's fear of being trapped is a common cause of school refusal, with reports suggesting that up to 100,000 school-aged children across England avoid going to school each year. A new report by Alder Hey Children's Hospital NHS Foundation Trust will use the findings of the National Children's Bureau's cohort study to develop a model of effective therapy to help children find safe methods to deal with their fear of being trapped. Funded by the National Institute for Health Research, the study is looking at children with a high fear of being trapped who do not want to attend school and are unwilling to attend alternative arrangements, such as school-based work or extracurricular activities. More than 40,000 children in England are estimated to avoid going to school each year because of fear of being trapped, which is a common fear among children with autism spectrum disorder, anxiety and obsessive compulsive disorder. 'Education is a powerful tool for social and emotional wellbeing,' said leading trauma expert Professor Jackie Lythgoe of Alder Hey Children's Hospital NHS Foundation Trust. 'We have found that treatment based on this model results in improved academic outcomes compared to those of children who receive medication, a 'wait-and-see' approach or receive treatment that is not evidence-based. 'Previous studies have shown that fear of being trapped is so damaging to the child's emotional health that social intervention is probably better than the use of medications. Our results will aid the development of effective education interventions for children who avoid learning due to fear of being trapped.' Dr Sandra O'Connor, clinical director for children and young

Baekdal - A New Piece of the Music Evaluating a new score system to predict post-surgery complications in patients undergoing radical prostatectomy. To develop and evaluate a new score system to predict post-surgery complications after radical prostatectomy. Radical prostatectomy is the primary treatment for localized prostate cancer. Many patients experience post-surgery complications after surgery, and many of these complications are severe and even life-threatening. A new score system was developed using a consensus-based method with an expert panel of clinicians to assess the association of post-surgery complications with their severity. The new score was then compared with existing scoring systems to determine its predictive value for the complications. Using a consensus-based method with an expert panel, we developed a new score system to evaluate the level of harm of post-surgery complications. The new score system uses a simple system of ordinal scoring. The new score comprised seven complications that were categorized into two groups based on their level of severity. We then assessed the predictive ability of the new score system for post-surgery complications, using Cox's proportional hazards regression model to predict the risk of each complication. The agreement between the new score system and existing scores was assessed using the kappa statistic. The new score system has proved to be useful in predicting several post-surgery complications in patients undergoing radical prostatectomy. The new score system had a higher overall agreement with existing scores than did the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center and the American Urological Association (AUA) instruments. The new score system had the highest overall agreement for the 'resumption of urinary function' and 'urinary leakage' complications, as well as the 'urinary incontinence' and 'leakage' complications. We also evaluated the adverse effects of undergoing radical prostatectomy. The new score system was an effective indicator of post-surgery complications and demonstrated a trend towards better predictive ability than the existing scoring systems. Our new score system can play an important role in evaluating the complication rates and in counseling patients on their surgical risks. This invention relates to improved lithium ion cells and methods of producing same. Batteries play an important role in electronics and in the emerging electric vehicle (EV) market. Lithium ion batteries have the highest energy density of all available cell chemistries.

With the advent of lithium ion batteries, significant research has gone into the development of lithium ion cells. Lithium ion cells contain three basic components:
