Hydraulic Inflator Is Here!,...1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of making a capacitor having a high energy density, or, more particularly, to a method of making a capacitor having a high energy density adapted to obtain a large electric capacitance and an excellent durability by the use of a dielectric layer of a novel composition. 2. Description of the Prior Art

In recent years, as part of the efforts to develop new methods of utilizing energy, in addition to various power sources such as, for example, batteries and dynamo-electric machines, various means for storing surplus energy have been developed. For instance, capacitors and fuel cells are utilized for storing a surplus of electric energy. In such energy storage systems, since the system is so designed as to operate by utilizing a surplus of electric power as energy, the reliability and durability of the whole system must be taken into consideration.

That is, in the case of a capacitor system, since the capacitance of the capacitor decreases with the lapse of time and the thickness of dielectric layer is reduced, while the voltage of power source is increased, and, further, since the life of the capacitor is determined mainly by the life of the material of its electrodes, the durability or life of the system must be considered upon designing the capacitor system. This is particularly the case in energy storage systems employing vanadium, since vanadium is exposed to a corrosive atmosphere during operation. To overcome the defects of these energy storage systems, research and development have been made on various material having an electric resistance lower than those of the conventional materials. As an example, there is known a lead dioxide dielectric layer having a high electric resistance. Since, however, lead dioxide has poor durability, this material is not a desirable material for capacitor electrodes.

Further, as another example, there is known a lead-calcium-strontium type dielectric composition
