Once you press the "OK" button, you can specify the output location and name of the new file. Conversion will immediately start. Before doing this though, you are probably interested in changing some settings. In "Properties" you can select the paper size, width, height, orientation, unit type and resolution. But you can also pick the format of the output file (e.g. PDF, BMP, JPEG) and color depth, as well as enable Universal Document Converter to create a single-page file for each page, append all documents to the existing file, and more. Additionally, you can configure options regarding cropping (e.g. automatically detect and crop borders) and resize (e.g. resize output image proportionally), as well as add watermarks (text label or picture). On top of that, you can use a predefined location and file name, enable Universal Document Converter to open the folder or file in the default viewer, or to run a custom application after the task is done, create a log file, add a toolbar to Microsoft Office, and more. A: Adobe Acrobat Google Docs A: Not sure if this would work for you, but you might consider using the native MS Word output feature and then importing into Illustrator. Save a copy of your document as a new file, change the formatting to match your need and import into Illustrator. Once you are satisfied with the outcome, you can change the formatting to match your needs. If the "Import" options are grayed out, you need to add the file to your word templates. This seems like a decent way to get the job done, but it's a little complicated. Edit: This is the type of tool I would be looking for if I were getting a lot of documents into Illustrator and didn't want to use AI. Custom Icon Description
